

A horse's strength is her greatest resource

When properly trained and harnessed, a mare can accomplish in minutes

what takes a work team
days.

She pulls out trees with her
bare hands,

cuts out
trenches with a hoof

drags scrap
for miles

But it is not easy

The power
must be coaxed
out

Willed

The body wants the power for itself, for healing,
for food energy
in rough times

Stressors help the mare learn in shaping her body, making it grow. Many rigors are unpleasant.
Some are dangerous

Bulge!

GROW

Many horses give up on the training with what little muscle
they managed

The mares who master
their transformation
power to the fullest extent however ...

Great risk.
Great reward.

For great power.

Strength through struggle. No other way.

A comic panel featuring a muscular horse with a brown coat and a dark brown mane. The horse is shown from the chest up, with its head turned slightly to the right. Its chest is notably small and undeveloped, with two small, pink, circular nipples. The horse has a determined expression. The background is a bright blue sky with vertical white lines, suggesting rain or a strong light source. The ground is green grass. Several black motion lines radiate from the horse's chest, emphasizing its size.

With every struggle
the body breaks.
Regrows.

Bigger!

Stronger!

BOOM!

Every trial too becomes greater and greater. The demand for strength rises, wells of power pushed to their limit.

New challenges

Strength is one factor.

Size is another consideration.

Dogs don't understand the pain of failure.

The stigma of weakness

They do not bear the expectation of others

Horses have to be strong

Horses have to be huge and tough

If a mare fails, she has no other values to mention. She's NOTHING
